Pet ownership requires a great deal of knowledge, time, patience and love. Many animal owners may not always consider the need to plan for their pets in the event of a disaster. A little planning and awareness before a disaster occurs can prevent tragedies afterwards.

What Do I Need to Know?

- Always take your pets with you during a disaster. Any situation that is dangerous for you is dangerous for your pets.
- Be ready for no electricity or phone for at least 72 hours to 1 week. Do you have food, water and supplies? Police and emergency services may be limited.
- Keep your pet's vaccinations current and always keep a collar and tags on your pets. Microchip your pets. Many pets are never returned due to lack of ID.
- Planning ahead for disasters saves lives. Please call the SPCA to schedule a disaster preparedness presentation.

How Should I Prepare?

- Include your pets and livestock in your evacuation drills so they are relaxed about travel and confinement.
- Submit your pet's information to the SPCA's free Guardian Angel program.
- If you use automatic waterers for livestock, identify alternative sources of water in case of a power outage.
- Any questions? Please call the SPCA for help or ideas specific to your situation.
- SPCA Monterey County will be there for you to evacuate and shelter pets during a disaster but preparedness goes a long way to avoid unnecessary stress and emergencies.

During a Disaster

- When you receive warning of a pending disaster or evacuation, ensure your pets are wearing collars and tags, bring them inside so you can locate them quickly, and locate your preparedness supplies.

After a Disaster

- Examine your property to ensure fencing is intact and remove dangerous debris.
- Watch for personality changes or changes in behavior.
- Consult your veterinarian or the SPCA if any behavior problems persist.

Disaster Preparedness Checklist for Pets & Livestock

The following is a list of suggested items for a disaster preparedness kit for pets and livestock. Please contact SPCA Monterey County if you would like to schedule a disaster preparedness presentation for your group or visit www.SPCAMc.org for the latest disaster preparedness information in English and Spanish.

Special Considerations for Small Pets During Disasters

SPCA Monterey County is committed to protecting pets and people during a disaster. Any situation that is dangerous for you is also dangerous for your pets, including birds, reptiles, fish, and other small animals. If you are given orders to evacuate, always take your pets with you.

Special Considerations for Birds

- Transport in a secure travel cage or carrier.
- Keep the transport cage in as quiet an area as possible. A blanket or large towel covering your pet's cage will help reduce stress while traveling and will help keep the pet warm in cold weather. Signs of hypothermia (lowered core body temperature) include prolonged ruffled feathers, lethargy and shivering.
- Carry a spray bottle filled with clean water to periodically mist your bird during extreme warm weather. Signs of hyperthermia (elevated core body temperature) include open-mouth breathing and standing with wings wide-spread.
- Keep your bird's leg band on the bird, recording the band number, and keep recent full-body color photos of your bird, with you in the photo, should your bird get lost.
- Use multi-layered paper towels in the bottom of our transport cage for quick clean-ups, simply removing the soiled layers as necessary.
- Birds have high metabolisms and must eat multiple times throughout the day. Have plenty of bird seed, appropriate to your species on hand, stored in air-tight containers or multiple small, vacuum sealed plastic pouches. Consider purchasing a timed feeder to automatically provide portioned food throughout the day.
- Keep a collapsible bird net on hand to help capture an escaped bird. Consider having the flight feathers on both wings professionally trimmed to limit flight capabilities. Caution: when performed correctly, this procedure will simply slow an escaped bird to a gentle glide to the ground and needs to be performed periodically, especially after molting.

Special Considerations for Reptiles

- Pet snakes and other small reptiles may be transported in a pillowcase in an emergency, however they should be transferred to secure housing as soon as possible.
- Have a large, shallow, sturdy bowl for water.
- Have a heating pad or hot water bottle to provide a heat source. (Note that any external heating device should only be used on a portion of the cage, so the animal can seek it out if they want, or get away from it if they are too warm.)
- Maintain at least a week's worth of species appropriate food stored for your reptiles.

Special Consideration for Small Animals

- Small animals such as rabbits, hamsters, mice, pet rats and guinea pigs can be transported in pillow cases in an emergency, but should be transferred to secure carriers as soon as possible.
- Have species appropriate bedding materials, food, food bowls and water bowls or water bottles available.
- Have on hand small boxes or tubes for hiding to help reduce stress. A large towel or blanket covering the cage will also help to reduce stress. Consider providing your pet's favorite enrichments or toys to also offer a distraction and help reduce stress.
- Maintain at least a week's worth of additional species appropriate bedding and food stored in air-tight containers or multiple small, vacuum sealed plastic pouches.

Special Considerations for Fish

- Purchase plastic transport cages (covered, with air holes and handles) for your fish from your local pet supply stores or online.
- Keep extra fish nets on-hand so fish can quickly be scooped from large tanks or aquariums and placed in the transport cage. Be sure to scoop water from the tank for the transport cage so transport water is the appropriate temperature.
- Maintain at least a week's worth of additional breed appropriate fish food stored in air-tight containers. Consider purchasing "vacation feeders" designed for fish to have on-hand. These will help provide timed, portioned food automatically throughout the day and are available from local pet supply stores and online.
